The knowledge and application of predator models for the trophic niche of resident communities are scarce. Therefore, the knowledge of trophic interactions and niche of organisms can better the use of these model organisms in conservation studies, especially using the condition factor index as a criterion for species selection. The aim of this study was to apply the predator-prey models for six trophic levels on inorganic matter and biological material and to evaluate their potential as a measure for the condition factor of these organisms to characterize the trophic interactions and the trophic niche. A total of 27 individuals of trophic levels were captured on the intertidal marsh of Arraial do Cabo do Mucuri, in São Paulo state, southeastern Brazil. After their capture, 30% of the individuals of each trophic level were preserved in 95% ethanol for PCR-RFLP analysis of the second internal transcribed spacer (ITS2) of the ribosomal cistron of the 18S-5.8S-28S subunit region, using the primer pair ITS5 and ITS4. The ITS2 molecular marker was also used for capture-recapture analysis and the trend of occupancy of each trophic level. The condition factor values were obtained through direct measurements. A repeated measures of the ANOVA showed significant differences in the value of the condition factor per trophic level. However, the alpha diversity revealed no differences between the three measures evaluated. The model of Vos Iversen (VOS) was the best predictive model for trophic interactions on biomass and inorganic b7e8fdf5c8
